Mental Illness is like any other disease and it requires ongoing treatments the same as any disease. With numbers like one in five suffering from mental illness, our neighborhoods, Faith Communities and families, faced with this illness, suffer in isolation and shame. We hope this conversation will get you interested in this issue, expose you to resources available, help you personally deal with family issues and maybe get your faith community interested by taking advantage of the programs offered by NAMI and becoming a mental Health Volunteer. Faith can play an important role in caring for those facing mental illness and for their families. That is why it is so important for faith communities to become active in addressing mental illness. It starts with raising awareness to reduce the stigma associated with mental illness, and continues to the active caring for those individuals and their families in our faith communities experiencing mental health issues.
